Dear Ms. Hesse,

I am concerned that Microsoft still has most of the cards to play in the non-holdout settlement. I am not confident that any form of monitoring will catch this company doing anti-competitive actions, especially under the apparent negotiated settlement. Remember that this company has drastically misrepresented its behaviors already, making ludicrous arguments in the face of what the consumer and programming public knows to be otherwise. You need only look to the special connections that Office products have to the OS to observe that Microsoft cheats, bigtime.

What could possibly motivate your group to trust them in any way?
